[redacted]

There was nothing much left to take up at the Commanders' Meeting. Afterwards, Generals Hodes, Dasher, [redacted] Hamlett and I spent a few minutes talking over the latest Soviet interruption of our military convoys in the Berlin area. They demanded a list of the goods carried in each truck. Hamlett has refused to furnish such a list. The Soviets have never previously made such a demand, and we all felt [redacted] Hamlett had reacted properly in rejecting it.

We had a pleasant lunch with about 20 agreeable Generals and then went to the big conference room. There I talked to them about the political significance of the Russian declaration of the unilateral suspension of nuclear tests.

We got back to Mehlem about 6 o'clock.
